Third Party Reporting is a process where a survivor is able to pass on information about the sexual assault they experienced to the police without having to speak directly to the police or make a formal report. In this process the survivor completes a form with the support of an Advocate and this information is sent to police without the survivor's identifying information. Police can use this information to track trends or patterns that could identify repeat offenders. It is important to know that police cannot lay charges based on a Third Party Report. A Third Party Report is not a substitute for providing a formal statement to the police. There are limits to confidentiality where the assault involves an intimate partner or child welfare concerns.
